Success and Failure Factors of Value – Added Production Programs at Poudres Métalliques du Québec in Tracy, Quebec

Steve Morin, Industrial Relations Department, Québec Fer et Titane Reynald Bourque, Full Professor, École de relations industrielles, Université de Montréal

Over the last two decades, the evolution of the economic environment and the internal dynamics of industrial organizations have prompted many companies to revise their management strategies to adapt to the new requirements of world-wide competition. These companies have adopted new work organization models in order to increase productivity, and thus their competitiveness in their respective markets. In this way, teamwork has been encouraged by many companies with a view to increasing functional flexibility and worker participation in the production process. This article is aimed at identifying the main contributing factors to the success or failure of teamwork within the framework of a value-added production (Impact-VAP) program implemented by a steel company from the Sorel-Tracy region in Quebec.

The above is a summary of a full article available at List of articles and case studies.
